UG depicts a bunch of stone-age cave-dwellers who, over a repast of barbecued boar, discover that it's more fun to act out than merely tell a story. The odd, hairy fur-clad Neanderthals proceed to try and mount a musical. Battles over casting, billing, producing, directing and collaborating follow... not to speak of love affairs and breakups. This slick, snappy play offers up amusing dialogue and a plethora of catchy tunes.

What happens when an athletic, but accident-prone father breaks his leg while playing with his children and the mother is forced to go back to work to bring home the bacon? Complete, hilarious and charming mayhem! Mom reconnects with her love of corporate America while Dad takes on the chaotic responsibilities of keeping the household together. However, switching roles comes with its challenges in the 1960s. The boss comes to dinner unexpectedly, the PTA barbeque falls apart, but things really come to a head when Dad, under his wife's name, enters his own cookie recipe into a contest and wins the big prize. Each struggles to balance their personal desires with the family's needs as well as deal with the limiting social codes of the time. It's "Leave it to Beaver" meets "Home Improvement", a hilarious comedy for and about the entire family.

Due to an unhappy curse, King Sextimus is unable to speak. Meanwhile his terror of a wife, Queen Agravaing, has taken over control of the mythical kingdom. Most importantly, in an attempt to keep Prince Dauntless single, she has decreed that only the princess that can pass her test may marry her son. Furthermore, no one else in the kingdom may marry until Prince Dauntless does. This is upsetting too many ladies of the kingdom. Luckily, Sir Henry is able to find an amazing princess, Winnifred the Woebegone. She instantly catches the attention of Prince Dauntless and from there on the story becomes absolutely fascinating. The melodious score by Mary Rodgers adds to the merriment.
